Emotional Intelligence for Leaders and Teams

Research indicates that “emotional intelligence” (EI) is a predictive success factor for leaders as well as teams. This seminar will explore the basic concepts of EI and provide practical recommendations for increasing EI in your own leadership as well as the teams that support organizational initiatives. Using the real-life and compelling metaphor of high-altitude climbing, join us on a journey into leadership theory and application that will provide you with strategies for increasing EI in your workplace.

Rob Ziegler is the Principal and Senior Consultant of Lumina Partnership, a Seattle-based organizational development consulting firm. Rob has been providing organizational development consulting support to a wide variety of public and private sector clients for the last 10 years. In addition to his consulting work, Rob has climbed in many of the major mountain ranges of the world, including four expeditions to the Himalaya.

How to “Attend” a Webinar

Attending seminars has taken on a whole new definition with advent of Webinars. One can “Attend” via the internet and it is almost like you are there. The process is simpler than it sounds. All you need is one of the following: a computer with an internet connection and speakers or a land line, a cell phone with internet access, or you can participate on a limited basis with a just plain old phone. You will be sent a link via email and all you have to do is click the link and you are in. Participants can see the whole presentation right on your screen and ask questions via phone or chat. Our first Webinar will be, fittingly enough, “How to Attend a Webinar.” This will be a great way to experience the technology and become familiar with the system before we go live with an actual Seminar.
